In the wake of the tragic events in Charlottesville, Va., and widespread hate crimes against members of minority groups, the internet has felt a sudden outpouring of hate. People are sharing a string of messages that they've had hundreds, or even thousands of times, and suddenly feel like the most patriotic ones they've ever written. The posts are funny and sometimes cute, but it all comes back to a thread of virulent, uncivilized, and totally dehumanizing hate. Some of the messages are trolls, posted by people whose identity is unknown, but they're all glorifying their hate with the glitziest names. Others are from people who wish harm on those who are different than themselves. And some are from people whose only goal is to provoke, to make someone else feel as if they're the one being hated. One thing is clear: Hate can't be permitted in this country. And it's not as though we didn't know this. But now we're seeing it put in writing, and we're seeing the consequences of hate. The Huffington Post did a survey of the hateful things people are sharing on social media, and the results are shocking: In the two hours leading up to the gathering of hate, HuffPost found a slew of comments directed at the families of Heather Heyer and the man who was killed in the car-ramming attack. Hate, too, was directed at people who identified as anti-racist. And when anti-racist people countered by sharing hate, it was reposted to the offending trolls, increasing exponentially the hate. Overall, hateful comments account for more than 32% of the total. So if hate is so prevalent, why do we still allow the internet to be so free? and be returned to the landfill where it ultimately ends up. 2. Cleaning Agents and Deodorants You know those big bottles of starch, baking soda or even the powder on your face? That stuff is actually detergent. Yes, detergent. You can make laundry soap at home, and it will work better than any store-bought soap, but if you're anything like me, you probably have detergent thrown in your garage and not your laundry. Why? Because it's easier to throw a little powder into your laundry machine than it is to go to the store

Idk, if that's a dog.. I mean I could see it being a puppy or not sure but it looks like a female, let's call it a female. If they're owned by a flock they can get sick a lot easily and they're good to have, but I don't believe they are part of the flock. You won't see dogs in the back of an RV or truck or anything like that, but some people with large or off road trucks have fenced in yards and other animals are allowed to go in. I just don't see it being quite part of the flock. I wouldn't hate it, I just don't want to have it.Does my dog need a gun? - Should your dog be trained to protect you with a firearm? Does my dog need a gun? - Do you love your dog? If the answer is yes, then you also want to protect him, right? Most people don't own a gun, but still, they want to protect their home. Do they need to have a gun to do that? Yes. And if you do not own a gun, you may still want one. Today, we will take a look at whether your dog needs a gun or not. When is your dog going to protect you? It's really interesting to see that most of the people whose dog is a guard dog do not even have a gun. Yet, they are thinking, "My dog needs a gun". Is it a real question or are they just putting ideas in their head? Let's check it out. As you know, a dog is a home protector and a guard dog. Well, what does this mean? It means that a person is never safe from their dog. If you have a dog, you might have some disagreements in the past. Your dog does not want to be with you at the moment. Or, he might let you down and not do what you want him to do. That's when he goes in search of someone to take the most pleasure and comfort away from you. That's when he starts to protect your home! Why do people want to buy a gun for their dog? Do you love your dog? Well, if you do, then you might love his independence. If you do not love your dog, then this might not be the
