I use Windows Authentication and I want to create windows authentication ticket with the access token. But Session.SessionID and Principal doesn't have that field. How to do that? A: An access token is nothing more than a blob of data that can be encrypted and sent in a secure manner. You only store the access token (which is, in fact, the HTTP header) in your database after the user successfully authenticates and is authenticated into the app. Once the user has been authenticated in the app, it's your responsibility to ensure that all subsequent requests are authenticated with a valid access token to avoid a replay attack from another user. One way to do that is to read the access token from the header and then validate it on every request. By doing this, you ensure that only the authenticated user is allowed access to the resource the request is for. Doing this, you can simply store the access token in the database with a boolean validation field to ensure that the resource is allowed the access. Once that access token has been validated, set this validation flag to true (even if the access token was never validated before or validated and set to false). Typically, if a user was authenticated using single sign-on, that would allow you to implement the above scenario. Also, in general, (and I would suggest this) you don't want to store and authenticate a user's credentials directly in a database (I've seen several guides out there that do this and it's wrong). The only exception to this is if your database is a simple key/value store where you're confident that there will only ever
