There has been an increasing interest in oocytes fertilized using their own sperm. However, in vivo studies are challenging and require new experimental approaches that will have practical clinical applications. Herein we describe the development of a novel functional assay that allows detection of human spermatozoa fused with their oocytes, a critical event in the process of fertilization. The assay was developed by using chlortetracycline-loaded oocytes. To determine whether human spermatozoa acquire chlortetracycline, we evaluated chlortetracycline internalization by human spermatozoa and oocytes. Human spermatozoa transferred chlortetracycline to both oocytes and zona-free oocytes. However, a significantly higher percentage of chlortetracycline was transported to oocytes. After 5 hours incubation, about 94% of chlortetracycline was transferred to the oocytes. Compared with the percent of chlortetracycline transporting to oocytes, the percent of chlortetracycline transporting to zona-free oocytes was higher. When oocytes were cooled, chlortetracycline transfer was significantly reduced. These results demonstrate that the chlortetracycline assay can be a practical tool for assessing human sperm capacitation and determining the success of human in vivo fertilization.
