State Regulators The New York Public Service Commission has been using predictive maintenance technology (PVT) to keep its aging energy distribution and control equipment in good working order since 1999. But as the commission adopts key regulatory milestones toward modernizing the grid and expanding distributed energy, migrating to cloud-based technology has been a game-changing decision for the agency. "Our relationship with the cloud made a lot of sense for us," says David Snook, a senior engineer in the PSC's Program and Policy Office. "We're a data-driven commission, and we're good at working with information." One of the main reasons the PSC decided to get into the cloud was because of the commission's mission to provide access to cost-effective technologies to benefit customers and the state. It was also a necessary move given the pace of technological evolution. "We have a long history of being trailblazers and trying new things out. We've always been on the leading edge of what's happening in the industry," says Cynthia Dugan, senior director of the PSC's Energy Delivery and Energy Efficiency and Customer Assistance Programs. "We thought we needed to be doing this as the technology changes." Dugan and the PSC's IT services have been working with data and analytics to determine how best to upgrade its aging infrastructure. They began to engage with the broader utility industry in 2016, with an interest in partnering with smart energy companies. "You need to look at a range of different technologies, and one of the first things we needed to look at was whether to use a cloudbased system or a traditional system," says Dugan. "And when we started to look at the technology, we realized, 'Oh, we've got a lot of experience with this; we should get it right the first time." The agency initially decided to focus its research and development on cloud systems to save money and time in the long run
