Before we get into that, I should mention that I do not personally own any Android tablets (a customary name for this tech company) so I can't speak from there, but I can only imagine that Android tablets operate similarly. This should not be seen as a negative against the platform, but rather a positive, since it means I am not particularly impressed with it. Luckily, this review will focus on Adobe's program, and not their hardware. Well you're preaching to the choir. I've been on Photoshop CC since the early beta and have been an avid user of Photoshop since way back when. I've been a reliable user and a very high-volume contributor for the software. As such, I will somewhat be biased towards the software. However, I don't think that's going to change my views on any of the new features just because I'm a CC-member. In other words, I'm going to be so-so at best. I have to be honest: the new save system (which is what your review is about) and the new display system are the only additional features I'm really interested in. I still don't give up my Aperture files for photo editing. It's so incredibly difficult, but I don't get why Adobe still hasn't added the "Import Aperture Directly" feature to Photoshop. As far as performance goes, the new AI system is gorgeous to work with, but I miss that we can't save in PS format anymore, and the AI system is still a little buggy. Nothing you've mentioned has really changed that in my opinion. As graphic design classrooms become increasingly accessible, stenography or typing out long and complex Photoshop/GIMP tutorials, or writing scripts to migrate assets between multiple designs is becoming a necessary skill to master to get clients, teammates, or even yourself on the same page. If you're a visual designer in a vogue-driven industry like journalism, it may be time to dust off the keyboard and get to work. For a tool well known for its visual design superiority, there are surprisingly few options available for quickly delivering custom-crafted vector assets. While developers like my colleague Branden Fritts are busy mentoring students through the intricacies of CSS and JavaScript, there's still a gap where designers are needed to bring their ideas to life. This is where a product like Protected might come in, as it's a simple script that can be customized to your own workflow. We recently found a working demo .

This tool will also be available if you're opening a folder of images, so you can select the exact images to apply an effect. This is vital for those who do work in a team, as it makes it much easier to apply identical effects.
