While the illustration featured above shows a pretty extensive list of the improvements I've included in this version of the software, that is the small portion of what the team at Adobe has done. Perhaps one of the most significant changes to Lightroom is the addition of the Actions panel. Action are filters that automate some type of process. With the previous version, the user had only the somewhat limited ability to set the Actions filter inside the Lightroom program itself. Now, the user can import a previously created starter file and add a series of actions to it. The user can also add modules that automate multiple steps of certain processes, and even nest those steps into other modules. Of course, actions can be created and saved to a standard library. They can also be used to automate a process even if they aren't resident on the author's computer. Any one could upload their actions to any location and then apply them to other images. Adobe has also made the process of batch processing images a little easier with the new Batch rename module. Lightroom is not the only program that has been updated. The Creative Cloud now includes all of the major Adobe programs, including Indesign, Illustrator, Photoshop, InDesign and all the other Creative Cloud products. Adobe will also continue to offer the Encore subscription until June 30, 2017, for those using the free, 14-day trial versions. This will save you money because once the trial runs out, you will be automatically converted to the standard monthly payment option and get Google OAuth for secure access to your files.
